

7. SECTION NAME GOES HERE

This is a paragraph with a few footnotes in it. The first is “footnote,” which is simply text inside the brackets of the footnote;<sup>1</sup> another is a “footfullcite,” meaning this is the first time the cite has appeared;<sup>2</sup> and a third is a “footcite” (meaning, it will reflect that the footfullcite has been cited earlier.)<sup>3</sup> The rest of this is dummy text using the ipsum package, except that here is an excerpt of a source with appropriate indentation. The first footfullcite was to an article; this one is to a book.<sup>4</sup> And here is a footcite to the same source:<sup>5</sup>

“Do you like LaTeX? If so, you may find this template useful for creating a section to a longer document. When you are finished editing the section, you can drop out the front matter and drop it into your longer document, with a table of contents (not shown here) and a bibliography (which is shown here). Happy LaTeXing!”

Note also that the number of this section is not set dynamically. Instead, using the “setcounter” directive, the last (dummy) section is specified as a certain number so that the following section is that number + 1. Also, this is a new paragraph because there is a line between it and preceding text, but to make it look like a continuation of the prior paragraph (after the indented excerpt), the “noindent” directive is used to suppress the indentation on the first line of the paragraph.
